3M has sold a specialty ballistics division for $91 million to England-based Avon Rubber, affecting some 160 employees in Irvine, according to the Minnesota-based company.

Longtime Register readers might recall that Orange County-based Ceradyne, a maker of ballistics plating and military armor, was sold to 3M in 2012 for $860 million. The company, founded by Joel Moskowitz in 1967, made specialized ceramics for industrial and military use and had offices in Costa Mesa and Irvine. Moskowitz died in 2015.

A statement from 3M said the deal to sell the division was specific to 3M’s advanced ballistic-protection business only.

“It excludes Ceradyne’s businesses related to technical ceramics, specialty additives, thermal and fused silica, and stable isotopes,” a 3M representative told the Register this week.

The company said the deal, subject to customary closing conditions and regulatory approvals, is expected to be completed in late 2019 or early 2020. “Some 280 3M employees, who primarily support the business, are expected to join Avon Rubber as a result of the sale,” the statement reads.

Avon Rubber designs specialized defense products, according to Bloomberg. The company also researches, develops and manufactures respiratory protection systems, milking point solutions, liners, and tubing for dairy processing.
