Coronavirus Safety Compliance

A one-stop shop

Daniel Yu, the agency's associate director of occupational health and enforcement, said the portal was designed as a one-stop-shop where employers can access information that otherwise would have to be pulled from different sources.

He said the site is designed so that employers — especially smaller businesses that may not have an HR department — can retrieve information that is all in one place.

A wealth of information

Human resources and employers who use the portal can access a variety of resources, including training and resources, COVID-19 testing, California's temporary emergency standards and additional information via the COVID-19 tool kit.

Employers are initially asked which county their business is in, and the portal then connects to multiple services that offer COVID-19 resources.

The portal features are selected based on the user's response.

Privacy is protected

The portal doesn't ask for personal information and the data it collects is for educational purposes and will not be used for state employment purposes, Yu said.

Additional questions address what employers would like to see, and Yu said that they can comment on whether the business is providing enough resources, what kind of enforcement activities are occurring supplementing paid sick leave and other factors.

Employers can leave feedback, "That's so we can do contact tracing," Yu said.

The portal doesn't ask for a business name or any other personal information and the data it collects is for educational purposes and will not be used for state employment purposes, Yu said.

The portal doesn't ask for personal information and the data it collects is for educational purposes and will not be used for state employment purposes, Yu said.

Additional questions address what employers would like to see, and Yu said that they can comment on whether the business is providing enough resources, what kind of enforcement activities are occurring supplementing paid sick leave and other factors.

Employers can leave feedback, "That's so we can do contact tracing," Yu said.

The portal doesn't ask for a business name or any other personal information and the data it collects is for educational purposes and will not be used for state employment purposes, Yu said.